

Several years ago, while sojourning in France, I had for my neighbor an amiable old man, M. Gotard. He was a gentle, kindly person, with a peculiarly pleasant and certain things, but with a very charitable and tolerant outlook upon the world in general. I met him one morning on my way from home. When he found we were neighbors, he at once became very friendly and called on me that evening. Our garden was joined, the hedge was low between them, and I often caught a glimpse of a rosary around his fingers as at twilight, he paced the alleys up and down.

from under her pillow, and placed them in my hands. "The beads I shall cherish above everything that has belonged to you, my darling," I responded, "but to say them would be a mockery, a blasphemy, what you would call a sacrilege. I cannot do it." "She wiped the tears from her cheek, smiling as she wept, and kissed me. "Papa," she said, "wisely, I can wait." That afternoon she died. When I returned from the funeral to my desolate home my heart was all but broken. For the first time in weeks I took my pipe and went into the garden, where I had been accustomed to sit in the evenings, under a tree close to the house, while Corinne sat at the piano, singing. I could not smoke; I simply leaned my elbows on my knees, my head buried in my hands—and wept. Now, monsieur, I hope you are listening.

singing does not matter—it is in your garden—it has nothing to do with me, though I shall always like to hear it should it return. "And now, monsieur, I shall leave you, for it is growing chilly, and I have talked too long. But every word I have told you is the truth. I make not the slightest account of the legend which says that the nightingale will follow one whom it likes over land and sea. I do not believe it—the idea is absurd. There is but one solution to the story I have told you. I believe it as firmly as I believe in the immortality of the soul. We shall meet again—my beloved ones and I—we shall meet again. Good night, monsieur." Then he left me, and, as he descended the steps of the arbor, I heard the click of his rosary as he took it from his pocket.—Mary F. Monnie in Extension.

Things are seldom what they seem, "is an old refrain. In the other days scientific knowledge was claimed by soothsayers, charlatans and magicians. Fables and myths were accepted as science by people who, in their time, were quite as brainy and quite as sure of their opinions as the self-educated are to day. No branch of physical science has yet reached the limit of its possibilities, and until it does so, it has no right to claim that science in another line of thought, is limited to its degree. The various schools of warring scientists are proof enough that this statement is true. One set vigorously condemns the opinions and rejects the conclusions of the others who return the compliment with emphasis. There are some who cry out against the dogmatism of the Church, but this is only a gentle zephyr when compared with the cyclonic fury of would-be scientists, who demand for their guesses the most absolute and questionable submission of all, even of God's infallible Church. So, then, if you have been stung by the vociferous claims of materialists, who wish to substitute for Christ's religion the experimentalism of very fallible explorers into the vast abysses of physical science, do not yield to temptations against your faith and morals. Do not exempt yourself from the obligations of your religion, because you have been told that there is a conflict between it and science. Remember that there can be no antagonism between true science and true religion because they both come from the same infinite wisdom of God. If there should be an apparent conflict it comes from the causes mentioned above by the Vatican Council. It will be of great advantage to you to cut out this quotation and paste it in your scrap book where you can consult it from time to time.—The Pilot.
