

Touch Thou Mine Eyes.

Touch Thou mine eyes—the sombre shadows falling Shut from my sight the kindly light of day!

Dark is the path, through desert places leading: Lonely and chill the wastes of doubt and fear;

Life of the life that hour by hour is dying, Dying I live by Thy sustaining grace;

THE RETURN.

The opera was "Faust," and the theatre presented an animated scene, for the whole of official Washington was clamoring at its doors.

From her box near the stage, the mother of Constance Cathro, the young prima donna, watched the gathering of the brilliant audience.

And what a cosmopolitan gathering it was—foreign diplomats in all the splendor of their official regalia.

Without doubt the young songstress would have every stimulus to appear at her best, for the audience, taking its cue from the politically mighty,

Toward the close of the second act she appeared, a fleeting vision of youth and beauty that left the spectators, like the lover Faust, pining for another glimpse of her.

Her enraptured mother felt no dejection in the moderate applause, for she was sure it would be forced to cheer long before the curtain fell.

She felt the need of restoration, and, glancing at her husband, found it in the exultation and pride which covered him like a garment.

"Such youth, such beauty, and a voice beyond the reach of mortals! Sonator, you have given us a Marguerite for whose love any Faust would be justified in making any sort of a bargain."

The curtain went down on the third act amid a storm of applause. Washington never withholds approbation from merit, and Constance Cathro, as Marguerite, radiant in the joy of success, was called out again and again.

Mrs. Cathro had allowed herself, from the president's box came a hastily scribbled note, and Mrs. Cathro looked up from the warm, congratulatory words to meet across the house the kindly bow and smile of the writer, the gracious first lady of the land.

The curtain had gone up again and the young prima donna returned to even greater conquests. Once more her voice, rare and sweet in the Spinning Wheel song, crossed the ears and stirred the hearts of the auditors.

"You have singers, you Americans! To have been here tonight is to have heard one!" The tones were excited, those of a person moved to enthusiasm.

"She certainly has a divine gift," came the answer, "but they say she has no faith, is an atheist."

"What, so lovely a flower without perfume! Impossible!" "It is a pity, for a woman without religion is like what you say—a flower without perfume."

"If it is true, someone is to blame for it. Behind her work is a heritage of religion. Yes, yes, otherwise she could not be so convincing."

They were applauding now, but Mrs. Cathro heard and saw as in a dream. At the remarks of the Italian, the phantoms again welked. She was scarcely conscious of the opera's shifting scenes.

The act had reached the terrible church scene and she was suddenly keenly aware that her daughter's voice was rising sweet as that of a seraphim.

Of what avail had been ambition and wealth when they failed to drown those memories that shivered and scorched? Mrs. Cathro cowered in her seat as if shrinking from an avenging spirit.

"A flower without perfume." At that moment, above the swelling harmonies of the priest's chorus, she seemed to hear the words. It was the voice of her own soul shouting its accusation. Started, she raised her eyes to where Constance poured forth her song for mercy, in throbbing, plaintive notes, like the rhapsody of a nightingale.

At no point in her tragic journey from love and belief to apathy and renunciation had she been so tormented. Her mother and her child stood up before her to wage battle in her soul.

And then—just then—when her sense of the abject weakness of her own faith and of her utter unworthiness to shake doubt from another soul overwhelmed her, the vision of her mother rose before her.

She shuddered at the jeopardy in which her sin had placed the soul of her gifted child.

And then—just then—when her sense of the abject weakness of her own faith and of her utter unworthiness to shake doubt from another soul overwhelmed her, the vision of her mother rose before her.

But, as her soul found strength, her body seemed to weaken. She grew suddenly faint and sick. She touched her husband's arm. He turned toward her and stared at sight of her face.

He reached for her cloak, and hastily arranging it about her shoulders led her from the box. Inquiring eyes followed them as they made their way out, and solicitude stamped itself on many countenances at sight of the pallor of Mrs. Cathro's face.

"Oh, no, indeed, dear," she remonstrated, "you could not do that and be back in time for the finale. It will be disappointing enough for Constance not to have me here, but if you should be absent, too, it would break her heart."

"But I cannot let you go home alone. You look far from well." "It's simply one of my old heart attacks," she returned weakly, "and you know they always seem more serious than they really are. James can take me home and bring the car back for you."

Seeing that any other arrangement was only likely to disturb her, he made her as comfortable as possible in the machine. "It's just too bad, dear, that this had to happen, he said as he kissed her. "Our little girl has had an unparalleled success tonight, and your absence from any part of it will dim the laurels for her."

When he regained his seat the final curtain was descending amid plaudits that shook the walls. Greater voices Washington had heard; but never a rarer, more perfect "Marguerite." And her voice, that took captive the senses, seemed to hold all earth's sweetest sounds.

Of course, there was to be a supper afterward, and, of course, the young prima donna, radiant and joyful in the first flush of her triumphs, must needs run home for a minute to assure herself that her mother's indisposition was nothing serious.

When the rush of the big machine was heard in the driveway below, Mrs. Cathro dismissed her maid in order to receive her daughter alone. She was not surprised that she had come. Somehow she felt that she would. The hurry of light footsteps sounded on the stairs, the swish of draperies along the hall, and Constance, her arms full of exquisite floral offerings, stood in the doorway.

"Oh, mother," she cried, "it was a success!" The flowers dropped to the floor and her strong young arms went round her mother in a rapturous embrace. "You are better now, mother, dear?" Her clear dark eyes regarded Mrs. Cathro anxiously.

"Yes, Constance, darling, I am better." "You were satisfied?" she whispered. "Satisfied! I was exultant. You were your grandmother over again, except—and here her voice trembled and again her eyes were shadowed with the poignant reflections that had accompanied her during the preceding hours—" except—that your grandmother was a Catholic!"

For the second time that night it seemed to Mrs. Cathro that her own soul rose up to accuse her. "I—I sold my birthright for a mess of pottage," she moaned.

For an instant the turmoil of the girl's thoughts held her as by a spell. In the interval her brain pieced out the whole sad story and took in the significance of her mother's sudden illness. Then, with a glance as shining as the flash of a seraph's wing, she touched her mother's arm.

"Mother," she whispered, "would it please you very much if I would go back to my grandmother's faith?" Her mother looked at her curiously, eagerly. Vague hopes gripping her heart set her breathing rapidly.

"Please me? Why, child, it would open the gates of paradise for me!" "Then they are already ajar, dearest, for I am to be received into the Church next week. I wanted to wait until to-night should be over. I knew your prejudice and father's against the Church, and hoped that the triumph I looked forward to would help both of you to view my step with some resignation."

Mrs. Cathro sank back in her chair; her eyes grew moist; her hands trembled against her dress. "But what drew you; what influenced you, Constance?" she finally gasped. "My music, mother. From the day I started with Doimini I began to get a glimpse of the old faith that was wonderfully enlightening. It was like catching the first glimmering of what was to be a glorious sunrise. In his artless Catholic way he interpreted the works of the masters for me, and because so much that is best of the masters is the expression of the faith that was in them, consequently he interpreted much of that faith to me. It all gripped me strangely. I know why, now—I had a right to the grand old faith." She lifted her head proudly with the words.

It is a wise thing to throw out old medicine. Keeping it is rash economy, as many drugs lose their strength while others deteriorate and become dangerous to take. Then the same physical conditions do not often occur, and it is always safe to get a new prescription, or at least have the old one freshly put up. Besides, if old bottles accumulate, one is apt to forget what they contain, and in an emergency seize on the wrong one, with serious results.

On your way to the office, if you are a business woman, or when you walk to market in the morning, if you happen to be a happy housewife, don't forget to take deep breaths.

They are the means by which you will lay a strong, firm foundation for future health and beauty. It isn't too much to say that a good deal of your success in life will depend upon deep breathing, for by filling the lungs to their greatest capacity we gain confidence and determination as well as poise, all essentials to success.

THE REASON WHY.

forth as St. Leo stood before Attila at the gates of Rome.

In the very nature of things, the law of God cannot give way to the law of man, in the last resort.

The last time we had occasion to assert this in these columns, we challenged any Protestant denomination to say that, in no conceivable case, would it feel obliged to resist the civil power.

But one might as well seek to account for a cyclone, by tracing it back to the agitation of the atmosphere caused by a passing train, as to try to trace the "anti-clericalism" of Europe to erring or imprudent churchmen.

"C. D." thinks there should be an investigation of the causes of "anti-clericalism." He seems to suppose that little is known of those causes—to speak of the Church being "practically supreme" in any nation, or in any age, is merely begging the question.

It is not true that there is no "anti-clericalism" in "mixed communities."

The puzzle remains—a puzzle for some people at any rate—Why do the people put up with it? Well, why did France put up with 15 complete changes of the whole system of government in a period of time during which Nova Scotia, Ontario, New York and Massachusetts have had practically no change of governmental system?

Indifference to the day-to-day developments of public affairs; neglect of the franchise; an insufficient press; an habitual and temperamental inclination to obey law; a conception of citizenship wholly different from the Canadian or American; and a tradi-people in the 16th century, in some countries, were not in a healthy condition religiously, and that this was partly attributable to bad conditions amongst the clergy.

We come back to "C. D.'s" dread of clerical interference outside the sphere of the Church. Every brute who ever wore a crown, every "free-thinker" or Freemason who intrigued in any capital in the world, has talked of clerical interference.

Nor have even the "anti-clericals," eager as they have been to discredit the Church, been able to show bad conditions in the ranks of the clergy or bishops of France.

The history of that century, and of the years up to this date, is the history of state interference with religion. French politicians could give "C. D." some pointers about the "overlapping" of the spheres of Church and State, and, if they were candid, could open his eyes to the opportunities for tangling up the boundary lines between the two "spheres."

The puzzle remains—a puzzle for some people at any rate—Why do the people put up with it? Well, why did France put up with 15 complete changes of the whole system of government in a period of time during which Nova Scotia, Ontario, New York and Massachusetts have had practically no change of governmental system?

Indifference to the day-to-day developments of public affairs; neglect of the franchise; an insufficient press; an habitual and temperamental inclination to obey law; a conception of citizenship wholly different from the Canadian or American; and a traditional acceptance of State meddling in Church affairs; these, on the part of the people, go far to account for the apathy of the body and bulk of people who are sincerely Catholic.

Moreover, when the French Revolution gave way to orderly rule under Napoleon, the confiscated church property, the gifts of centuries of piety, remained in the hands of the State; and the State undertook to pay the clergy.

On the side of the "anti-clericals," there have been: (1) a political machine; (2) a definite campaign; (3) the most secret of all secret organizations, Freemasonry; (4) a civil service, shaped and run as a part of the political machine; (5) a traditional principle of arbitrary law-making such as would not be endured for a day in Canada, or in the United States; (6) Lies; (7) Irreligion.

The anger of the people, however, has frequently flared up, sporadically. Whenever it did so, they found themselves helpless.

And yet they are slowly but surely taking a sound course though we think an unnecessarily slow one. They are letting the government go on; they are not disputing the right of way with the political "steam-roller;" but they are, every day, rallying quietly to the support of religion and the old Church.

A MISSIONARY MIXTURE.

The harm done to the service of humanity by bigotry and spite is witnessed to by the splitting up of funds for the Putumayo Mission. The Protestants gleefully announce that their mission is now complete, but then add that they only have £3500 out of the £10,000 they require.
